A Message from Attorney Bryan Ramos

What makes me stand out among other attorneys?

At the beginning of my law career, I worked as an insurance defense lawyer. There, I became very familiar with the corporate objectives of denying benefits, or, at the very least, delaying the benefits so long that some employees would simply just give up. I soon realized that wasn't the life for me.

As a lawyer who represents Georgia's working class, I sincerely attempt to empathize with my clients. I want to know exactly where they are coming from so I can better serve them. I take extra time to get to know each client, and some times their families, and take pride in being their lawyer. My concentrated area of the law is workers' compensation.

I have the unique perspective of knowing how the insurance firms work, and this gives me the edge over many other injury lawyers and those who just "dabble" in workers' compensation law. I have almost 20 years of workers' compensation experience and our firm, not only navigates the client through the pending litigation but we play the long game to consider the client's life after the claim.

Injured on the job...

If you get hurt on the job, keep it simple. Make sure you are safe and generally okay. Your health is the most important thing you must protect. If you need emergency room care, go get it! Otherwise, report the injury to your supervisor immediately. Tell him or her how it happened, who was involved, and how you are hurt. If you can, take pictures of the accident site and write down what happened in your own words: include the date, time, location, description of the accident, and list all the witnesses. If your supervisor makes you complete an "incident report," get a copy of it or at least, take a good picture of it with your phone. If you are in pain, ask the supervisor for medical care. He or she should be trained on what to do and should provide you with some options for medical treatment. Whatever documents the supervisor or doctors' office gives you, keep a copy of it as it may be important later. If the injury is bad enough that you think you will miss work, you need to call us. You will need a dedicated team of experts working for you because you know the insurance company has one working for them. Oh, and one last thing: DO NOT submit to a "recorded statement." This tool will only be used against you if they get an opportunity.
